Diet and Nutrition for Cancer Survivors

Message from the Guest Editors

More and more cancer patients survive due to modern treatments; however, their needs regarding nutrition are seldom met. Issues begin with information on alleged cancer diets, micronutrients, and supplements and the gap between health claims and evidence. Moreover, some patients suffer from long-lasting sequels of treatment; for example, gastrectomies affect eating as well as many social aspects. More and more patients are under continuous or repeated treatments, which have an impact on eating, and there is a greater need for more evidence-based information that is understandable for laypersons. This Special Issue will focus on all these different aspects of nutrition in survivorship, including scientific evidence as well as patient information and patient communication.
