Current Insights into Household and Community Food and Nutrition Security

Message from the Guest Editors

Household and community food insecurity is a growing global issue, with profound impacts on physical, social, and mental wellbeing across the life course. Factors such as austerity measures, climate change, rising living costs, and recent pandemics have exposed vulnerabilities in food supply chains, policies, and safety nets. This Special Issue invites empirical studies, evaluations, and reviews addressing the prevalence, determinants, outcomes, and solutions for food and nutrition insecurity. Topics of interest include health and wellbeing impacts; cultural food security; policy solutions for income, housing, and structural barriers; reimagining food safety nets; and building local food systems. We welcome contributions on diverse populations, including migrants, refugees, and Indigenous communities, as well as community-based strategies adopting a food systems approach.
