Nutrition Education in Medicine

Message from the Guest Editor

Diet is the most prevalent modifiable risk factor for chronic disease. Nearly all adults receive care at least once a year from a health professional such as a general practitioner, nurse or allied health professional. Yet, nutrition discussions occur in very few consultations and only some people with a poor diet can recall ever discussing nutrition with a health professional. Barriers such as low nutrition knowledge of health professionals, low confidence and poor time prohibit these discussions from taking place. This Special Issue aims to examine how nutrition is integrated into medical and health care training as well as how nutrition care is provided to patients through a broad range of disciplines including dietitians, nutritionists, general practitioners, nurses, pharmacists, allied health professionals, coaches, and retail settings. We welcome the submission of studies that describe the effectiveness of interventions and educational initiatives as well as the reorientation of health services to focus on lifestyle behaviours, specifically diet.
