

Special Issue

Diet and Inflammation in Older Adults

Message from the Guest Editors

During recent decades, a number of studies have pointed out that dietary behaviors have the potential to modulate the age-related progression of metabolic and inflammatory risk factors, contributing to a state of metabolic inflammation ('metaflammation').. Currently, there is a paucity of studies specifically targeting older adults, and potential differences in trajectories of metabolic inflammation progression and changes in body composition due to ethnicity, age, and biological sex are yet to be determined. Altogether, there is an urgent need to further understand the extent to which dietary behaviors impact metabolic inflammation while considering physical activity behavior in aging populations of various backgrounds. The goal of this Special Issue is to compile state-of-the-art research, including original and review contributions, elucidating the role of dietary behaviors on the metabolic and inflammatory environment in older adults. Contributions addressing regulatory mechanisms related to metainflammation, as well as circulating nutritional biomarkers, are also encouraged.

About the Journal

Message from the Editorial Board

Nutrients is an on-line open access journal that was first published in 2009. Nutrients adheres to rigorous peer-review and editorial processes and publishes only high quality manuscripts that address important issues related to the impacts of nutrients on human health. The Impact Factor of Nutrients has risen rapidly since its establishment and it is now ranked in the first quartile of journals publishing in the field of nutrition and dietetics research.
