Use of Anesthetic Agents: Management and New Strategy

Message from the Guest Editors

The use of new anesthetic agents with the intention of promoting the recovery of patients in the postoperative process has been the subject of multiple studies. Procedures with multimodal anesthesia are addressed in the chain of nociception and in different situations of hyperalgesia, have been the subject of different research studies and meta-analyses with the intention of delving deep into the knowledge of their benefits. Our knowledge of the organoprotective role of anesthetic drug administration has been advancing in recent years, , the association of oncological recurrence with dissemination during the oncological process, thanks to the surgical procedure and possible hematogenous dissemination has been the subject of continuous work in which attention is drawn to the different activity of halogenated and intravenous drugs depending on the tumor type. Therefore, we invite contributions to this Special Issue as an opportunity to evaluate anesthetic drugs as therapeutic tools.
