Pharmacotherapy of Thromboembolism

Message from the Guest Editors

Thromboembolism is an emergency clinical situation with high mortality and postevent morbidity. The number of patients at risk for antithrombotic therapy-related complications who require long-term anticoagulation is increasing. Long-term therapy in patients with chronic diseases, elderly and frail patients, patients with cancer-related thromboembolism, or patients with the need for chronic anticoagulation who undergo vascular interventions could be problematic. This Special Issue has the aim to summarize the state-of-the-art drug discovery and drug design, and the latest findings in the field of long-term antithrombotic therapy, management of antithrombotic therapy in challenging clinical situations, and antithrombotic strategies in acute thrombotic complications during invasive vascular procedures.
