

Special Issue

Novel Anti-proliferative Agents, 2nd Edition

Message from the Guest Editor

Cancer is one of the most widely spread and complex forms of disease, as cancer cells are distinguished from healthy cells due to their altered proliferation and survival. In the past three decades, the National Cancer Institute (NCI) alone has screened millions of small molecules for potential anticancer activity. Despite a number of conventional cytotoxic approaches having been developed, their limited effectiveness, in accordance with the heterogeneity of cancer cells, prompts the constant search for novel natural or synthetic compounds with properties involved in growth inhibition or tumor cell activity reduction. This Special Issue of Pharmaceuticals invites both reviews and original articles regarding basic, preclinical and clinical studies on antiproliferative chemical entities. I look forward to receiving your contributions.
