Multicomponent Nanomedicines for Photodynamic Diagnosis and Photodynamic Therapy

Message from the Guest Editors

Even though different drug discovery studies are composed of a single chemical entity, most analysts believe that “the one drug to fit all” approach will be unsustainable in the future as many diseases are multifactorial in nature and individual molecular targets cannot usually combat multifactorial diseases wherein multiple tissues or cell types are affected. Therefore, multi-drug or multi-target therapies are considered to be advantageous for multifactorial diseases. Our focus of this Special Issue is on multicomponent targeting drug delivery for photodynamic diagnosis (PDD) and photodynamic therapy (PDT) of oncological diseases. In addition, nanotechnology integrated with PDD and PDT strategies is a promising approach for the diagnosis and treatment of accurate lesions. In this regard, this Special Issue aims to publish high-quality research papers and reviews focusing on the design of smart nanomedicines in the PDD and PDT of various oncological tumors.
