Bioactive Agents for the Treatment against Tuberculosis

Message from the Guest Editor

This Special Issue aims to highlight the application of bioactive agents, synthesized (as biomacromolecules, peptides, conjugates, nanocomposites, etc.) agents, or promising isolates (such as toxins, proteins, lipids, enzymes, etc.) with high pharmacological and therapeutic activity against sensible and multi-drug-resistant MTB. Studies concerning administration methods as well as carriers are accepted Special Issue, as well as those related to their physicochemical characterization studies, pharmacological and enzymological parameters, drug release, biological activity and in vitro and/or in vivo studies. Reviews of current challenges and potential new drugs launched in recent years are also acceptable. It is hoped that the articles published in this Special Issue can solve the current challenges facing society related to the discovery and knowledge of drugs, as well as explore the advances in medicinal chemistry against MTB. We look forward to receiving your contributions.
