

Special Issue

Advances in Delivery of Peptides and Proteins

Message from the Guest Editors

The following Special Issue focuses on the critical role peptides and proteins play as therapeutic agents in treating various diseases. Despite their therapeutic potential, the effective delivery of these macromolecules presents significant challenges due to their large molecular size, instability, and vulnerability to degradation. Thus, developing innovative delivery systems is vital to improve their bioavailability, stability, and precise targeting. Recent advancements in areas such as nanotechnology, encapsulation techniques, and novel formulation strategies have provided promising solutions for overcoming these challenges. This Special Issue aims to highlight the latest research and technological innovations in peptide and protein delivery, particularly emphasizing novel approaches and methodologies that address existing delivery limitations. Contributions are welcome on topics such as nanoparticle-based delivery, controlled release systems, and advanced strategies to enhance oral, transdermal, and injectable delivery routes.
