Emerging Drugs and Formulations for Pain Treatment

Message from the Guest Editors

Relief from pain is a human right; however, the existence of significant barriers such as the lack of individualized therapies, the increased opioid crisis, and the undertreated patients with difficult pain syndromes can make this process difficult. In response to overcoming the major barriers of pharmacological pain treatment, we are pleased to invite all researchers of preclinical and clinical areas to contribute to this Special Issue entitled “Emerging Drugs and Formulations for Pain Treatment”. Original and review articles on preclinical and clinical findings focused on new drug design, reformulations, combined therapies, drug targeting, nanomedicine, delivery and controlled-release systems for drugs, advanced pharmacogenomics and pharmacogenetics therapies, and improved pharmacokinetic and pharmacodynamics processes of analgesic drugs, which enhance the understanding of treatment and release of pain, are welcome. Research areas include (but are not limited to) chronic, neuropathic, nociplastic, oncologic, and rare syndromes of pain conditions and others. We look forward to receiving your contributions.
