Advanced Micro and Nano Drug Delivery Systems Designed for Cancer Therapy

Message from the Guest Editors

The latest advances in nanomedicine are aimed at targeted delivery of drugs to tumor foci after intravenous administration with the possibility of avoiding excessive accumulation of toxic drugs in normal tissue. The recent successful application of nanostructured particles as delivery vehicles has demonstrated the superior potential of nanostructure-based technology for drug delivery in biomedicine. This Special Issue addresses the multidisciplinary field and aims to discuss innovative advances in the design and applications of nanostructured systems for cancer diagnosis, imaging, and therapy. We invite authors to report their recently developed inorganic, organic, and composite nano/microparticles for the delivery of anticancer drugs, photosensitizers, siRNA, etc.
