Message from the Guest Editors

Hydrogels have gained attention in the medical field due to their intrinsic advantages over conventional materials and methods. Their low-cost nature, chemical variety, biological compatibility, processing methods and stimuli-responsive behavior make them an interesting alternative to current medical technologies for a broad range of applications.

This Special Issue, entitled Hydrogels in Medicine, covers the methods and technologies involved in the development of such matrices, from the chemistry to their applications; surface functionalization, such as thin films, hydrogel nano-patterning; biocompatibility studies with cells and tissues; flexible bioelectronics; and large-area medical devices. Applications include: in vitro diagnostics, tissue engineering, holographic sensors, flexible/wearable/implantable devices, and organ-on-chip systems.

We cordially invite you to submit your original research article or a review paper to this Special Issue

Best regards,
