Wood Polymer Composites in Engineering and Environmental Applications

Message from the Guest Editors

Wood polymer composites have been considered alternatives to metals, plastics, and solid wood in automotive applications, aviation equipment components, sporting goods, and the construction industry. In recent years, they have been developed and successfully introduced into the engineering and construction marketplace, and the global market has experienced significant growth in North America, Europe, and East Asia. The goal of this Special Issue is to cover all aspects related to the challenges and innovations in wood polymer composites, especially in engineering and environmental applications. Authors are welcome to submit their latest research on this topic, in the form of original research or review articles.
