

Special Issue

Polymers and Polymer Composites for Dental Application

Message from the Guest Editor

Polymer composite materials are widely used in the dental field in clinics as a biomaterial or functional material. For example, they have been used as a composite material, a type of biomaterials, to repair caries and restore masticatory function, and as a luting agent to adhere the restoration to the tooth substrate. It is with great pleasure that we invite you to submit an original manuscript investigating methods for intraoral restorative composite materials or a comprehensive review on dental polymer materials for this Special Issue. Contributions including research articles, communications, and reviews from experts all over the world are welcome.
