Polymeric Porous Materials and Derivatives for Advanced Applications

Message from the Guest Editors

Porous polymeric materials represent one of the most challenging targets of the scientific community because of their outstanding properties for multiple applications. This Special Issue is focused on the synthesis, characterization and principal uses of those polymers and polymer-derived materials with well-developed porosity and excellent textural properties. Special attention will be paid to those formulations derived from bio-based precursors towards a greener picture of the upcoming future. Our aim is to provide the latest achievements on the use of these porous polymers for the different applications such as supercapacitors, water remediation, electrocatalysis, adsorption, energy storage, and those still unexplored.
