Religion in Extractive Zones

Message from the Guest Editors

This issue invites a more robust theorizing of religion in extractive zones. It aims for new approaches but also calls for reflection on the ways religion has already been theorized out of a backgrounded extractive zone. The questions considered might include (but need not be limited to) the following:

- How might such an approach change religion and ecology or religion and economy discourse?
- How might such an approach change narratives about, framings of, and responses to climate change?
- What human and more-than-human modes of resistance emerge in extractive zones? What counter-extractive modes of relation assemble here and what is their proximity to the sacred?
- What new insights might be gained into the ways religious and scientific knowledge is drawn from methodological or material extractive zones?
- What ethical and religious issues emerge in the extraction of human or other-than-human genetic material?
- How is race produced in relation to religion in extractive zones?
- What are the gender dynamics employed in resistance to, or support of, extractivism?
- What modes of coloniality are resisted or reinforced through religious practice in extractive zones?

About the Journal

Message from the Editorial Board

Fresh developments in the disciplines that consistently make significant contributions to our understanding of religious personality, authority, devotion, and community – disciplines ranging from psychology, sociology, and anthropology to history, art history, philosophy, literary criticism, and political science – fuel general, as well as scholarly, interest in the world's religions.

Religions is inviting innovative and comparative contributions. Please consider Religions as an exceptional, exciting enterprise ready to reward your trust, attention, and participation.
