

Special Issue

Historical Erasure in the Context of Religion

Message from the Guest Editors

Marginalized groups—including Indigenous peoples, ethnic minorities, LGBTQIA+ individuals, persons with disabilities, and women—have long been excluded from religious histories. This is not due to a lack of evidence, but because their stories have been systematically ignored, dismissed, or erased. Such omissions reinforce narratives of absence, fueling ongoing discrimination and trauma. This Special Issue explores how historical erasure operates across religious traditions and periods—from ancient to modern. We seek original research that critically examines the exclusion of marginalized voices, particularly those of Indigenous, Queer, and non-Western communities. Contributions may include case studies, thematic analyses, or methodological reflections aimed at recovering suppressed narratives. By centering often-silenced perspectives, this issue aims to challenge heteronormative and colonial frameworks, fostering more inclusive and equitable religious histories. We welcome interdisciplinary submissions.
