Diasporic Hybridity: How It Impacts Religious Identity and Practice in Today's Pluralistic World

Message from the Guest Editors

Diasporic hybridity refers to a compendium of experiences consisting of the following key features: an uprooting (intentional, unintentional, or even coerced) from what was considered an original homeland and the movement to a new, often inhospitable place/context/situation in which individuals and/or communities come to acquire a complex hybrid identity due to being simultaneously located in two (or more) worlds.

We pose this key question: What are the concrete ways by which diasporic hybridity influences and impacts religious identities and practices in contexts characterized by religious pluralism and diversity?

This Special Issue aims to add a variety of new viewpoints and empirical discoveries to the current literature regarding the interplay between hybridity, diaspora, religion, and pluralism. By uniting researchers from other disciplines and possibly investigating a variety of case studies from various geographic regions, this Special Issue will provide a forum for critical engagement with the theoretical frameworks that form our understanding of hybrid identities in various diaspora contexts, religion, and pluralism.
