God, Logic and Language

Message from the Guest Editor

The philosophy of religion has garnered great interest in the past few decades. Scholars often have renewed and advanced discussions regarding the role of language and metaphysics and how they relate to God. Many issues concerning the nature of God are highly influenced by one's views of how language is applied to him (e.g., univocally or analogically). Language and logic relate to various concepts of God, such as omnipotence, omniscience, eternity, and so forth. It is sometimes not appreciated how closely linked theological issues are to the nature of language.

We are pleased to invite submissions to this Special Issue on "God, Logic, and Language." In this Special Issue we will explore topics that relate to the intersection of the philosophy of language, metaphysics, and the philosophy of religion; topics include (but are not limited to) the following:

- Logical and metaphysical problems related to the concept of God and his attributes;
- The meaning of religious claims and the nature of language used to describe and talk about the divine;
- Arguments for God's existence.
