Meaning, Mind and Evolution: New Perspectives in the Study of Religion

Message from the Guest Editor

We are pleased to invite you to contribute to the Special Issue 'Meaning, mind and evolution: new perspectives in the study of religion'. This Special Issue aims to focus on the ways in which the cognitive and evolutionary approach to the study of religion can deal with issues of culture and meaning in religious belief, behavior, and experience. We believe that the highly successful approach to the study of religion known as the cognitive and evolutionary approach has unduly neglected the meaningful component of religious worldviews, which has been the traditional object of analysis of the social sciences and the humanities. We do not think that there is any incompatibility between this approach and the novel perspective of the cognitive and evolutionary sciences. On the contrary, we believe that both lines of enquiry are needed to obtain a complete scientific explanation of human religiosity. Still, very few researchers have actually tackled this inherently cross-disciplinary issue of religious cultural meaning, which also considers the insights provided by the cognitive and evolutionary approach. This is the void that we would like to fill with this Special Issue.

About the Journal

Message from the Editorial Board

Fresh developments in the disciplines that consistently make significant contributions to our understanding of religious personality, authority, devotion, and community – disciplines ranging from psychology, sociology, and anthropology to history, art history, philosophy, literary criticism, and political science – fuel general, as well as scholarly, interest in the world's religions.

Religions is inviting innovative and comparative contributions. Please consider Religions as an exceptional, exciting enterprise ready to reward your trust, attention, and participation.
