Religion in Australian Public Life: Resurgence, Insurgence, Cooption?

Message from the Guest Editor

The failure of religion to disappear from the public realm in the wake of secularisation has sometimes been theorised as a "religious resurgence". An alternative might see the Australian scene as "religious insurgence," in which religious movements' self-consciously-adopted oppositional status vis-a-vis a perceived secular polity becomes, in itself, a source of energy. Or does the energy come, instead (at least some of the time) from above rather than from below, with governments and business "co-opting" religious bodies to serve interests of the state or capital? This Special Issue invites contributions examining the many ways that religion operates in current Australian politics and public life, broadly conceived. How do religious and other forms of power intersect, interact, reinforce and oppose one another? How can we expect these patterns to change in the coming decades, and what questions – for researchers and for Australian society – will these changes generate? Prof. Dr. Marion Maddox

About the Journal

Message from the Editorial Board

Fresh developments in the disciplines that consistently make significant contributions to our understanding of religious personality, authority, devotion, and community – disciplines ranging from psychology, sociology, and anthropology to history, art history, philosophy, literary criticism, and political science – fuel general, as well as scholarly, interest in the world's religions.

Religions is inviting innovative and comparative contributions. Please consider Religions as an exceptional, exciting enterprise ready to reward your trust, attention, and participation.
