

Special Issue

Religion, Ecological Conservation, and Public Health

Message from the Guest Editor

The Special Issue endeavors to provide a deeper exploration of the relationships among religion, ecological conservation, and public health by examining the interrelatedness of these three diverse fields. This will potentially include a wide range of issues including but not limited to in-patient healthcare, vaccines, climate change, species and habitat protection, environmental and public health ethics, and the spread of infectious disease. The goal will be to provide a scholarly assessment of the role and influence of religious belief and practice for efforts to adequately address the conditions necessary to protect the flourishing of human and nonhuman life on Earth. By examining the interconnectedness of religion, ecological conservation, and public health, this edition will add an important layer of depth to existing scholarship focusing on the relationship between either religion and ecology or religion and public health.

About the Journal

Message from the Editorial Board

Fresh developments in the disciplines that consistently make significant contributions to our understanding of religious personality, authority, devotion, and community – disciplines ranging from psychology, sociology, and anthropology to history, art history, philosophy, literary criticism, and political science – fuel general, as well as scholarly, interest in the world's religions.

Religions is inviting innovative and comparative contributions. Please consider Religions as an exceptional, exciting enterprise ready to reward your trust, attention, and participation.
