Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Advances in digital technologies are allowing people and things to constantly stay connected and synchronized with the Internet, introducing us to a world always connected and full of possibilities, thanks to the detection, processing, and sharing of the data collected by the devices. Particularly, the availability of microcontroller-based data-processing electronic boards, smart sensors, and wireless communication modules, all featured by ultra-low power consumption and high performances, offers new application solutions in the wearable devices field, which enable real-time and punctual monitoring of user's biophysical parameters. This Special Issue "Wearable Sensors and IoT-Oriented Systems for Life Quality Improvement" brings together innovative developments and synergies related.
