

Special Issue

Building Community Resilience to Disasters

Message from the Guest Editor

Considering the increasing frequency, severity, and destructive impact of natural and human-made disasters, proposing a Special Issue on “Building Community Resilience to Disasters” is, for a Social Sciences journal, both timely and essential. This interdisciplinary theme merges various fields such as sociology, psychology, geography, economics, political science, public health, communication, public policy, and environmental justice. By incorporating both global and local perspectives, this Special Issue can offer a comparative analysis of international experiences, taking into account the distinct cultural and historical factors that influence community resilience. It also presents an opportunity to advance theoretical frameworks in the social sciences, especially those centered on disaster resilience. Importantly, this Special Issue emphasizes empowerment and equity, prioritizing the needs of marginalized and vulnerable groups in resilience-building discussions and also fosters investigation into how technological and social innovations can synergistically enhance disaster response and prevention strategies.
