

Special Issue

Refugee Admissions and Resettlement Policies

Message from the Guest Editor

Refugee resettlement, like refugee policy, has largely been developed in a piecemeal way. Consequently, migrants in the most need find themselves without the services and support necessary for long-term integration and well-being. This is especially true for migrants who are not classed as refugees. Assistance with other daily living activities is sometimes provided through non-governmental organizations, complicating the matrix of resettlement. While general attitudes toward refugees are sympathetic, tensions surround the resettlement and integration of these peoples into their host countries. In this context, this Special Issue seeks papers from a range of disciplines that examine and broadly consider refugee admission and resettlement policies. We welcome a variety of regional, methodological, and disciplinary perspectives that examine the historical and/or contemporary landscape of refugee migration and resettlement, with a special interest in explorations of under-researched policies, groups, or regions.
