Migration, Labour and Health: Unravelling the Links between Labour Exploitation and Health Disparities of Migrant Workers

Message from the Guest Editors

The development of a global labour market is linked to social inequalities and the use of migrants to form a flexible workforce characterized by invisibility, precarity, and denial of rights. Precarious employment comprises a substantial social determinant of health inequities, with public health repercussions. Migrant workers are at a higher risk of exploitative and hazardous work conditions and health problems due to their precarious employment, immigration status and socio-economic marginalization. The Special Issue invites original theoretical or research articles focusing on the nexus of migration, international labour migration and health policy, to critically examine the health status of migrant workers.
