Migration, Labour and Health: Unravelling the Links between Labour Exploitation and Health Disparities of Migrant Workers

Message from the Guest Editors

The development of a global labour market is linked to social inequalities and the use of migrants to form a flexible workforce characterized by invisibility, precarity, and denial of rights. Precarious employment comprises a substantial social determinant of health inequities, with public health repercussions. Migrant workers are at a higher risk of exploitative and hazardous work conditions and health problems due to their precarious employment, immigration status and socio-economic marginalization. The Special Issue invites original theoretical or research articles focusing on the nexus of migration, international labour migration and health policy, to critically examine the health status of migrant workers.

About the Journal

Message from the Editor-in-Chief

Social Sciences is an international, open access, peer-reviewed journal publishing the latest research across all disciplines of the social sciences, including anthropology, economics, law, linguistics, education, geography, history, political science, psychology, sociology, and other related areas. The journal is especially interested in interdisciplinary research, and aims to encourage creative, innovative, and critical reflections across social science disciplines. The journal welcomes conventional length articles, shorter Research Notes or articles, as well as Special Issue submissions, as long as they meet the journal's standards of quality and originality.
