Racial Injustice, Violence and Resistance: New Approaches under Multidimensional Perspectives

Message from the Guest Editors

The current world is characterized by increasing socioeconomic inequality unfolding in the midst of a pandemic, the threat of another world war, along with energy and environmental crises, human rights violations, the growing pervasiveness of far-right wing repertoire, and uncertainty and existential challenges.

While studies document new forms of inequalities in the U.S. and in Latin America, seldom do these works employ interdisciplinary frameworks including the role of technology and social innovation in documenting the structural factors and social mechanisms that have given rise to a populist far-right movement, and the reproduction of human rights violations and oppression which today more than ever impact historically excluded and racialized minorities.

This special “Social Sciences” edition makes a call for papers contributing to these emerging debates through the use of interdisciplinary and multidimensional approaches. This special edition strongly invites papers that combine academic rigor and a normative engagement with equality, social justice, minority rights, inclusion and democracy.
