Tourism and Migration for Sustainable Living and Regions: Possibilities and Limitations

Message from the Guest Editor

Across the world, many regions are facing common challenges such as economic stagnation, population decline, and environmental degradation. Addressing these issues requires strategies that go beyond locally confined responses and take into account broader dynamics, including global capitalism and planetary environmental change. Against this backdrop, sustainable tourism and lifestyle migration have the potential not only to serve as tools for regional economic revitalization, but also to foster ways of living that are more equitable, environmentally conscious, and socially connected. Such initiatives can also encourage societies beyond the region to reconsider values centered on rapid consumption, short-term gain, and individual status, and to deepen their engagement with environmental conservation, cultural continuity, and inclusive community life. We welcome submissions employing diverse approaches. In particular, we invite research that bridges local practices with global challenges, and comparative or interdisciplinary studies that clarify the conditions under which tourism and migration can contribute to sustainable and inclusive regional futures.
