Education Innovation and Change Leadership in an Emerging Artificial Intelligence Society

Message from the Guest Editor

Aligned with the aims of Social Sciences, this Issue emphasizes interdisciplinary approaches to social. organizational, leadership, policy, teaching, learning. governance, and community change leadership within Al-integrating contexts. Al's integration in universities. for example, presents significant implications for research processes, for teaching and learning, for faculty service, and even for libraries, emerging as curators of verified information. Absent from this discourse is the perspective of leaders and leadership scholars in this context. We welcome research contributions spanning disciplines, education systems. and communities involved with education institutions. Contributions may contain qualitative, conceptual, or review methodologies. Topics include, but are not limited to, the following:

- Leading to address Al-related fears in educational and social systems;
- Social entrepreneurial/social innovation perspectives on K-12- or university-integrated Al;
- The implications and impacts of AI in education policy and governance;
- The community impacts of AI on universities challenges and opportunities;
- Education system governance and Al—constraints and enablers.
