

Special Issue

Exploring Residential Mobility in a Changing Society

Message from the Guest Editor

Residential mobility is an enduring topic of study, perhaps because the causes and consequences of residential relocation are so varied across time, settings, and sociodemographic groups. This Special Issue aims to highlight the changing landscape of residential mobility over time and across settings. For this Special Issue, residential mobility is conceptualized broadly as the degree to which individuals change their residence and can include short- or long-distance moves within a city, region, or country. Special Issue submissions should reflect on new trends and critical conceptualizations of residential (im)mobility, including, but not limited to, mobile residentiality, mobility bias, and residential rootedness. Submissions are encouraged from any social science discipline and methodological tradition, including qualitative, quantitative, or mixed-methods approaches. Papers should include a theoretical framework and empirical analysis.
