Message from the Guest Editor

The world is becoming more intensely aware of the critical issues arising from human use of its energy. Energy is a vital commodity that sustains human lives, as well as economic processes. Simultaneously, it is widely accepted that energy use contributes to various environmental challenges, including climate change, fossil fuel resource depletion, and air pollution. Nowadays, energy- and environment-related issues are significant issues that must be considered seriously as a policy and in order to achieve energy and environmental sustainability globally, especially in whole emerging markets. Moreover, both the theoretical and the empirical evidence on the effects of green energy and energy innovation on macroeconomic dynamics are limited. This Special Issue will explore studies concerning the development, assessment, and management of energy and environmental issues. The Special Issue welcomes both qualitative and quantitative studies, as well as empirical and theoretical contributions.
