Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

The aim of this Special Issue is to contribute to knowledge related to the development of interventions for improving pro-environmental behavior, with application in all fields of sustainable development. Taking into consideration the urgent need to take action to improve the quality of life of each human being and their environment, it is crucial to establish which factors determine whether people act in an environmentally friendly manner, and which specific measures effectively lead to individual and collective actions with positive impacts on the environment.

We invite contributions addressing any aspect of pro-environmental behavior, with an emphasis on interdisciplinary approaches that can explore the complex and comprehensive character of the subject. Aiming to understand the present human conduct and its immediate and future impact on the environment, one focus should be on identifying, defining, investigating, developing, or assessing the types and directions of interventions on all dimensions: technical, technological, economic, educational, motivational, organizational, institutional, and regulatory.
