Message from the Guest Editors

For this Special Issue “Nature and Well-Being Science: Environments for Thriving”, we are inviting submissions of high-quality papers that explore the underlying mechanisms and impact of nature on well-being and mental health. Papers examining the links between natural environments on pro-social and environmental behaviors are also encouraged. Of special interest is the use of novel methods to measure exposure to nature as well as cross-disciplinary interventions and initiatives for promoting nature connectedness in a range of contexts (e.g., urban settings, vertical schools, workplaces) and for a variety of populations, including young people. Mixed methods and longitudinal studies are welcome, as are studies that test and advance nature theory and its relevance to mental health and well-being.
