This special issue will focus on how a more comprehensive understanding of the social aspects of the organic food chain - from fork to farm. Topics of interest include; efforts to localise food retailing and logistics, including questions of demand and motivation, the role of technology in mediating and brokering between farmers, growers, retailers and citizen-consumers. How farmers and growers are innovating and generating new knowledge in partnership with others. As well as the role of organic and agroecological discourses in debates about climate change, the future of meat, farmland conservation and food policy are also welcome. Contributions from geographical areas not yet present in the literature are particularly welcome. Papers can be theoretical or grounded in the field. The intention is to create a special issue that pushes the agenda on these urgent matters forward in a rigorous but accessible form that will help thought leaders and decision-makers at all levels.
