Message from the Guest Editors

This special issue gathers perspectives from social scientists working in the field of rural innovation. It aims to present new knowledge of how social science insights are used to practically enhance rural innovation. Particularly welcome are papers focusing on frameworks for the identification of good practices; tools for supporting multi-actor co-design; strategies that aim to understand and build networks; and evaluation practices that stimulate reflexivity. Social science theories of gender, diversity, participation and power will frame the practical approaches in the papers chosen for this special issue. Papers selected for this Special Issue will be subject to a rigorous peer-review process with the aim of rapid and wide dissemination of research results, developments, and applications.
