Message from the Guest Editor

This Special Issue will examine how considering self, nature, and self–nature relations can help tackle sustainability challenges. Submissions that leverage views of self and nature from the social sciences (broadly defined) in the service of producing prosocial and pro-environmental outcomes are encouraged. These papers should not only make contributions to one’s home disciplines but also be accessible and applicable to scholars, educators, and practitioners in many domains.

This Special Issue invites empirical papers and theoretical contributions that focus on some of the following concepts:

Self–nature representation; Inclusion of nature in self; Self-concept; Self-transcendence; Social and cultural identity; Nature size; Prosocial emotions and behaviors; Proenvironmental behavior; Environmental beliefs; Climate change; Community-based conservation; Place-based conservation

Original papers related to the above concepts that focus on connecting social science perspectives on self and nature with pro-environmental outcomes and sustainability practices are welcome.
