Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

We are living in an era of uncertainty, experiencing unexpected transformations due to critical issues related to climate, particulates and viruses threatening people's safety and health. The role of design in architecture and the environment is becoming more crucial for the quality of people's life in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, since architecture and environment are supposed to be a shelter for people who are undergoing such changes.

This Special Issue welcomes research contributions on cognitive studies related to the sustainable, resilient and regenerative development of our environments, in which the role of design is emphasized. We solicit interdisciplinary articles including environmental psychology, architecture, engineering, social sciences and technologies to share approaches to the proposed topic.
