Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Environmental governance is an essential determinant of sustainable development. This Special Issue welcomes studies that consider ecological, social, economic, or interdisciplinary perspectives of environmental governance and sustainable development in forest, agriculture, agroforestry, and urban land uses, at any spatial scale (individual, farm, city, regional, or global scale). In particular, this Special Issue will include papers that examine one or more of the following general themes for providing a better understanding of environmental governance issues, such as soil deterioration, climate change, biodiversity, water, air quality, ozone layer, nuclear risk, transgenic organisms, precautionary principle, and socioenvironmental conflicts; the main drivers of environmental degradation, such as economic growth, consumption, destruction of biodiversity, population growth, pollution, and destructive agricultural practices that lead to land degradation; and the impacts and consequences of main environmental governance agreements such as the Rio Conventions and Multilateral Environmental Agreements.
