Message from the Guest Editor

As far as the consequences and impacts of the sustainability of food consumption/practices in the foodservices sector and incidental effects are concerned, the body of research on foodservices is rather limited. These gaps underscore the need for theoretical and practical research to advance the progress on sustainability in the foodservice sector by addressing central research issues, which is the reason behind the current call for papers. Consumer attitudes, menu choices, packaging strategies, sustainable practices, and communication strategies have all impacted public health, the environment, society, the economy, and even climate change. Thus, gaining a better understanding of consumers' behavior towards healthy eating and sustainable consumption and the role of businesses is crucial.

The aim of this Special Issue is to collect research relating to sustainability in the foodservice sector, where consumers and businesses play a role in improving healthy eating and sustainable consumption. The topics can be found at the Special Issue website.
