Message from the Guest Editors

The purpose of this Special Issue is to stimulate, promote, and gather research at the intersection between these issues. We are particularly interested in contrubutions exploring the following topics (but also in works addressing other related topics):

- Short- and long-term macroeconomic consequences of infectious diseases;
- Short- and long-term environmental implications of infectious diseases;
- Mutual relationships between economic, environmental, and health outcomes;
- Effects of public policy on economy, environment, and health;
- Role of public (health, economic, and environmental) policy in promoting a sustainable development;
- Demographic and social aspects of the economy–environment–health relationship

Both theoretical and empirical (current and historical) contributions are welcome for this Special Issue. Works relying on economic, epidemiological, or environmental management approaches are welcome, and those integrating them from a multi-disciplinary perspective are particularly encouraged. We look forward to your contributions.
