Adaptive Cities: Urban Planning and Design Contribution for Achieving Climate Resilient Cities

Message from the Collection Editors

Specific policies to reduce global impacts of climate change represent urgent and controversial issues in the contemporary debate at the international level. At the same time, the role of cities and territories in implementing mitigation and adaptation policies at the local level has been often underestimated by international agreements on climate and carbon emission reduction, despite the fact that most externalities affecting climate change are produced within the urban environment, or by urban facilities; in fact, cities are the main places suffering from the specific impacts of climate variabilities with a specific attention to phenomena connected to two main categories: Extreme precipitation events and flooding and heating waves and warming.
