Message from the Guest Editors

We encourage researchers and practitioners to submit original research articles, case studies, and critical essays on topics including, but not limited to, the following:

New interdisciplinary and integrated analytical tools, spatially explicit methods, experimental and modeling approaches to investigate and address questions involving both ecosystem services and human well-being in urban areas;

Heuristic perspectives toward cross-boundary approaches and scaling of environmental problems and policies with a focus on urban landscapes;

Advanced use of indicators of urban landscape sustainability policymaking to overcome limitations of comparative research and support field-based study, incorporating knowledge of the variability, thresholds, drivers, and cross-scale linkages of ecosystems' functions and services relevant to the well-being of urban dwellers;

Planning regimes' strengths and weaknesses to realize opportunities in urban green infrastructure and ecosystem services in developing countries;
