

Special Issue

Advancing Gender Equality in Rural Areas of Developing Countries

Message from the Guest Editors

This Special Issue comprises papers that explore the multifaceted dimensions of gender equality in relation to sustainable development in rural areas in Africa, Asia, Latin America and The Pacific. This Special Issue attempts to tackle the following questions. How can the use of a gender framework promote individual and household development that is socially, economically and environmentally sustainable? How important are gender transformative approaches? How does the gender perspective fit into agroecological system thinking? What is the role of gender in relation to the search for sustainable solutions to humanitarian crises in rural areas? How do gender dynamics within development projects affect outcomes? How can we promote more equitable development in rural areas that acknowledges the needs and aspirations of both women and men? How do social movements fit within this discussion? What is the role of policy in this debate? And how does the rural–urban divide enhance or reduce gender inequalities?
