Educational Psychology for Student Well-Being and Sustainable Development

Message from the Guest Editor

The scope of this anticipated compilation of articles encompasses a variety of related psychosocial constructs, including school bonding; academic hardiness; academic buoyancy; happiness; thriving/positive psychosocial development; flourishing; life satisfaction/eudaemonia; and bullying. Furthermore, additional foci could include multiple aspects of students' vulnerabilities; for example, academically atrisk groups; immigrant/migrant status; grade retention; refugees; family separation; and selfhandicapping/learned helplessness. Of course, we anticipate analysis of the comparative values of diverse belongingness promotion strategies, such as school climate modification via the prioritization of mental health alongside academics; building authoritative contexts; extracurricular participation/teacher support/parent engagement/cultural change; the promotion of cooperative over competitive climates; multiculturalism over assimilationism; or mastery approaches to learning. We anticipate that this collection of research works around school belonging will help school leaders, particularly those in resourcepoor contexts, implement strategies toward enhanced school belonging.
