Sustainable Construction Engineering and Management

Message from the Guest Editors

Sustainability is increasingly a requirement of building projects. Consequently, the fields of construction management, project management, and engineering are called on to recalibrate work practices and processes to align them with sustainability objectives. The scope of opportunities for engaging with sustainable practices is large, ranging all the way from mining and procurement, through design, materials, and components manufacture; transportation; assembly; commissioning; operations; maintenance; and refurbishing, to eventual demolition and disposal. In the midst of all this are smart technologies, and ever-sophisticated operational systems that potentially augment sustainable outcomes.
