Renewable Energy: Social Acceptance, Markets and Innovation Policies

Message from the Guest Editors

The latest trend in energy markets, resulting in energy price increases and biased consumer responses, is the result of a combination of demand and supply factors, the external shock of the pandemic and global climate change dynamics. Therefore, the international scientific community is being called to reflect upon the role of actual markets, the response of consumers and societies as a whole and innovation policy strategies to facilitate the adoption of renewable energy. This Special Issue will present current and future research trends in renewable energy with a focus on social acceptance, markets and innovation policies. Topics of interest include (but are not limited to):

- Demand and supply analysis of current renewable energy markets;
- Current and future renewable energy technology adoption;
- Innovation policies and strategies for renewable energy;
- Social acceptance of renewable energies;
- Renewable energy technologies and the transformation of the global economy;
- Education on the renewable energy transition;
