Parent-Child Relationships in Adolescence and Young Adulthood

Message from the Guest Editors

The parent-child relationship constitutes the starting point for future relationships and is important for children's adjustment and well-being. Numerous studies show that a positive parent-child relationship is linked to various positive outcomes in children. This Special Issue of Youth offers an opportunity to publish high-quality papers relating to parent-child relationships in adolescence and young adulthood. This encompasses both positive and beneficial aspects of the parent-child relationship in these developmental periods, as well as challenges specific to the relationship between parents and children in these ages. Also of interest is how these specific characteristics are related to outcomes for children and parents. We welcome contributions from all the social sciences, including anthropology, economics, family studies, history, law, public health, public policy, social policy, sociology, social work, and psychology. Empirical reports, analytical reviews, and theoretically informed reflections will be considered. Inter- and multi-disciplinary submissions are encouraged.

About the Journal

Message from the Editor-in-Chief

Youth is an international and peer-reviewed journal covering a broad range of topics that all influence persons lumped into the category of youth. The numerous issues of interest to the research community involving youth include mental health, education, sociology, economics, employment, cultural studies, civic engagement, and other social perspectives of youth and young adulthood.

Our goal is to work together with the global research community whose interest and scholarship speak to providing evidence that will support and enhance the lives of youth and the systems that affect their lives. We are interested in working with graduate students, scholars, scientists, and research centers who share this interest.
